HEARING TO RECEIVE TESTIMONY ON

UNITED STATES CENTRAL COMMAND

IN REVIEW OF THE DEFENSE AUTHORIZATION REQUEST

FOR FISCAL YEAR 2021

AND THE FUTURE YEARS DEFENSE

Thursday, March 12, 2020

U.S. Senate

Committee on Armed Services

Washington, D.C.

The committee met, pursuant to notice, at 9:00 a.m. in Room SD-G50, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Hon. James M. Inhofe, chairman of the committee, presiding.

Committee Members Present: Senators Inhofe [presiding], Fischer, Cotton, Ernst, Cramer, Scott, Blackburn, Hawley, Reed, Shaheen, Blumenthal, Hirono, Kaine, King, Peters, and Manchin.
OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. JAMES M. INHOFE, U.S. SENATOR FROM OKLAHOMA

Chairman Inhofe: Our meeting will come to order.

The committee meets today to receive the testimony of the United States Central Command. I would like to welcome our witness, General Frank McKenzie, Commander of the United States Central Command.

I want to add that immediately following this morning’s open hearing, we will move to SVC-217 in the Senate Visitors Center for a closed session, which will be an opportunity for General McKenzie to answer some of the questions. You might make a note of questions that come along that are not appropriately answered in this setting so that we can do it later.

I would like to begin by recognizing two United States marines, Gunner Sergeant Diego Pongo and Captain Moises Navas, who were killed earlier this week during a mission against the ISIS stronghold in Iraq. I also want to recognize the two additional Americans who were killed yesterday, whose names have not yet been released. That was in a rocket attack in Taji. Their loss is a painful reminder that even where we have been successful, such as in destroying ISIS, the caliphate, we still have troops in harm’s way. And when Senator Rounds and I had the opportunity to meet with some of our troops 2 weeks ago in visiting Iraq, we had a chance to really talk over some of the things like this with them.

General, later this month, you will be commemorating your 1-year anniversary as CENTCOM Commander, and I sure you agree it has been a tough ride. Since May of 2019, we have seen Iran and its terrorist proxies escalate their asymmetric aggression against the United States and our partners throughout the region. In May, they hit our partners’ oil tankers. In June, they downed an American drone. In September, they attacked Saudi oil facilities, threatening the global energy supply. And throughout this up-tick, President Trump announced new sanctions on Iran, bolstering protection for our troops in the region, but he sought to avoid a military escalation and even offered to negotiate with Tehran.

Then in December, Iran’s proxies killed a U.S. citizen and attacked the U.S. embassy in Baghdad. These actions crossed the President’s redline, which we knew that by his very nature, he is going to adhere to his own redlines, unlike some others in the past. And the President responded by ordering a strike that ended up killing Soleimani.

Iran countered by firing ballistic missiles that thankfully missed our troops in Iraq, though over 100 soldiers sustained concussions.

Since then, the situation seems to have deescalated.
Iran countered by firing ballistic missiles and thankfully missing our troops, though over 100 soldiers sustained concussions. After that attack, however, the situation appeared to deescalate.

Yet, despite the deployment of approximately 14,000 new troops to the region to deter Iran, your written testimony says -- and I am quoting from your written testimony, General -- quote, ample intelligence exists indicating that Iran’s regime desired to continue malign operations that threaten lives. And early media reports suggest that Iran-backed groups were responsible for yesterday’s attack at Camp Taji.

So if the deployment of approximately 14,000 troops in the region will not deter them, I am sure a good question would be, what will deter them? We will have ample opportunity to respond to that question.

So I ask because this committee’s top priority is effective implementation of the National Defense Strategy, which says to focus on China and Russia as the central challenge to the U.S. prosperity and security and, as you highlight in your written statement, to accept greater risk in the CENTCOM AOR.

Countering Iran is an important aspect of American credibility in the Middle East, and bolstering American credibility is vital to preventing our partners from looking toward China and Russia for their security needs.

But every battalion that we send to the Middle East is a battalion that is not being sent to support other priorities in Europe and the Pacific. Moreover, this ramp-up in the Middle East comes while other priorities such as counterterrorism and security cooperation in Africa are being under-sourced.

So I hope you will address how these new deployments to the Middle East are changing Iran’s behavior for the better. Or, if conflict with Iran remains likely in your view, we would like to know -- you explain to us -- what these new deployments are achieving.

And with that, I will turn to Senator Reed.
STATEMENT OF HON. JACK REED, U.S. SENATOR FROM RHODE ISLAND

Senator Reed: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. Let me join you in welcoming General McKenzie back before the committee, and we look forward to your testimony and our discussion. Thank you, General.

Let me also join the chairman in expressing my condolences for the loss of the three coalition personnel at Camp Taji last evening and two of whom were reported to be American personnel, and the death of the two marines conducting operations against ISIS in Iraq earlier this week. Our thoughts are with their families and those who were injured in those two incidents.

The agreement between the United States and the Taliban, announced on February 29th, was a notable step toward bringing our nation’s longest war to a close. It is important to keep in mind, however, that it is only a first step, and the path to long-term stability in Afghanistan will only be found through a negotiated settlement between the Taliban and the Afghan Government. With that in mind, I am concerned that we are not appropriately leveraging U.S. and coalition military presence to support a settlement that protects U.S. security interests primarily and values, including the hard-fought gains on issues in Afghanistan like women’s rights and education. By announcing a timetable for the complete withdrawal of U.S. and international forces before inter-Afghan negotiations have even begun, I am concerned that we are in some respects undermining the Afghan Government and validating the Taliban’s longstanding perception that they can wait us out. Despite the specific timeline contained in the agreement, some in the administration have said that the 14-month timetable is aspirational and that we will have ample time to assess the Taliban’s intent and capability to uphold their security commitments. General McKenzie, I hope you will help us better understand how we intend to monitor and verify Taliban compliance. In particular, do you believe it will be possible for U.S. forces to conduct the rigorous monitoring and evaluation necessary to ensure that terrorist threats will not re-emerge in Afghanistan, while simultaneously carrying out a full-scale withdrawal? I would also like to hear more about the commitments we have made to our Afghan partners and how our efforts to build credible security forces and institutions will be sustained. The Afghan Security Forces have been nearly completely built and funded by U.S. and coalition funds. Additionally, until the signing of the U.S.-Taliban agreement, the Afghan Security Forces also received robust advising and enabling support from U.S. and coalition forces on the ground and in the air. Even with a peace agreement, there is little to suggest that the Afghan economy will, within a foreseeable time frame, provide enough revenue to fully fund the country’s security forces. Notably, the administration’s fiscal year 2021 budget request contains funding for Afghan training and equipping programs that will extend well beyond the date of the planned departure of the last U.S. military personnel. It is important for this committee to understand the plan to ensure those resources are invested in sustainable and responsible ways, especially given the likelihood of increased Taliban participation in the Afghan Government.

Despite the focus of the National Defense Strategy on a more resource sustainable approach to the national security challenges in CENTCOM, we have deployed more than 14,000 troops to the region since May in response to malign Iranian activity. While I understand the need to ensure U.S. personnel, facilities, and key strategic interests are protected, I question the extent to which we can deter asymmetric attacks by Iran through the deployment of additional conventional U.S. military forces to the region. Indeed, the rocket attack on Camp Taji in Iraq last night, reportedly carried out by Iranian-backed militia, would seem to challenge the notion that we have reestablished deterrence with respect to Iran. Overall, I believe that the administration’s so-called maximum pressure campaign has isolated us from our allies, given Iran a pretext to violate constraints placed on its nuclear program by the Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action, and may in fact have increased the likelihood of conflict.

The killing of the leaders of ISIS and al Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula were significant counterterrorism operations, and the administration should be commended for those operations. But the Turkish incursion into northern Syria, fallout from the killing of General Soleimani, and political unrest in Iraq, Lebanon, and elsewhere have disrupted our efforts against ISIS. I remain concerned about the long-term disposition of the more than 10,000 ISIS fighters being held by the Syrian Democratic Forces, as well as the unknown number of internally displaced people that retain an allegiance to ISIS. General McKenzie, I look forward to an update on CENTCOM's operations to ensure these groups are not able to re-emerge.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, very much.

Chairman Inhofe: Thank you, Senator Reed.

General McKenzie, we will recognize you for your opening statement. As you know, your entire statement will be made a part of the record.
STATEMENT OF GENERAL KENNETH F. MCKENZIE, JR., USMC, COMMANDER, UNITED STATES CENTRAL COMMAND

General McKenzie: Chairman Inhofe, Ranking Member Reed, distinguished members of the Senate Armed Services Committee, thank you for the opportunity to appear before you to provide an operational update and testimony in support of the fiscal year 2021 budget request pertaining to CENTCOM’s area of responsibility.

My senior enlisted leader, Fleet Master Chief Jamie Erdell of the Navy, is also with me here today, seated immediately behind me.

I appreciate very much your remarks about the sacrifices of Captain Navas and Gunnery Sergeant Pongo, as well as Corporal Zavala, a marine who was killed in a vehicle rollover during an exercise in UAE just a couple of days ago. Additionally, the two U.S. service members and the United Kingdom service member who died in the attack at Taji yesterday in Iraq -- they will be remembered.

Today there are nearly 90,000 men and women serving throughout the 20 nations comprising United States Central Command, as well as our headquarters in Tampa. I am proud of their remarkable dedication and humbled by their personal sacrifice, and it is my honor to serve with them. They are young Americans in the line of fire, working to prevent attacks on the homeland, counter destabilizing regional influence, prevent the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, and ensure the freedom of navigation through international waterways. Your annual and timely passage of both the National Defense Authorization Act and the Defense appropriations bills honors their courage and sacrifice, and I encourage you to maintain this tradition.

Keeping a pledge from my confirmation hearing before you here in December 2018, I appear now and offer you my best military advice. While my written statement highlights several nations and areas of interest within the Central Command area of responsibility, my opening statement today will focus on Iran.

The National Defense Strategy directs us to work with partners to deny the Iranian regime all paths to a nuclear weapon and to neutralize Iranian malign influence. This is no easy task. Iran’s regime is persistent and resilient, growing its arsenal of ballistic missiles despite international condemnation. And Iran remains the world’s largest state sponsor of terrorism. Since May 2019, Iranian proxies and Shia militia groups in Iraq have increased attacks on U.S. interests and conducted scores of aerial unmanned system reconnaissance flights near U.S. and Iraqi security force bases. The Iranian regime has attacked or seized foreign vessels in the Gulf, sponsored attacks by Houthi forces from Yemen into Saudi Arabia, continued the export of lethal aid to destabilizing groups throughout the region, and in September 2019, carried out an unprecedented cruise missile and UAS attack against oil facilities in Saudi Arabia.

In early January, Iran launched more than a dozen ballistic missiles in a deliberate attack against U.S. and coalition forces at two bases in Iraq. This state-sponsored missile strike crossed the threshold compared to previous attacks and has probably set a lower bar for future actions by the regime.

Yesterday, hostile forces, most likely Shia militia groups, launched more than a dozen rockets at U.S. and coalition forces at Camp Taji in Iraq, killing two U.S. and one British service member, as well as wounding several more. While we are still investigating the attack, I will note that the Iranian proxy group Kata’ib Hezbollah is the only group known to have previously conducted an indirect fire attack of this scale against U.S. and coalition forces in Iraq.

While periods of decreased tension may provide the illusion of a return to normalcy, ample intelligence and indeed yesterday’s actions indicate the Iranian regime’s desire to continue malign activities that threaten lives, destabilize sovereign nations, threaten freedom of navigation, regional commerce, global energy supplies, and the global economy itself.

At CENTCOM, we recognize that so long as the U.S. applies diplomatic and economic pressure, the joint force must be postured to deter Iran from employing the military element of power to counter our actions. Our presence sends a clear message about our capabilities and our will to defend partners and U.S. national interests. Going forward, it is CENTCOM’s objective to posture forces in the region with the operational depth to achieve a consistent state of deterrence against Iran and to be adaptable to future Iranian threats.

The Department’s fiscal year 2021 budget supports CENTCOM’s ability to keep our forces agile, lethal, and adaptable.

As we work with our partners to safeguard our mutual interests, we do so with the knowledge that we are stronger together. Key to building and maintaining partnerships is the authorization, funding, and employment of security assistance programs. Additionally, the National Guard State Partnership Program cultivates relationships and improves interoperability with six nations across the CENTCOM AOR, with more applying for entry this year. Again, the 2021 budget supports building new partnerships and enabling the formation of an enduring Middle East coalition.

As CENTCOM continues ongoing operations, we appreciate the efforts of our DOD civilian leadership. We acknowledge the teamwork of the interagency, and we thank the Members of Congress and your staffs, without whose consistent backing we would be unable to accomplish our mission. In order for America’s armed forces to sustain all-domain dominance, the Department requires your support, as well as predictable, adequate, and timely funding.

Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member, and committee members, thank you again for all you do for our troops and families, and I look forward to your questions.

[The prepared statement of General McKenzie follows:]
Chairman Inhofe: Thank you, General, very much.
And for any of the members who came in a little bit late, we announced that we are going to have a closed session immediately following this down in SVC-217.

General McKenzie, in the past year, in response to the Iranian provocations, we have deployed some 14,000 additional troops to the region. And you have indicated in your statement that more attacks from Iran are likely. And if so, in what sense are these new deployments to the Middle East deterring -- what level of deterrence do they provide? And is there another form of deterrence that might work?

General McKenzie: Chairman, I believe that deterrence is borne of an appreciation in the mind of the adversary of both capability and will. And we, over the last few months, have demonstrated both of that. As a result of that, I believe we have reestablished a rough form of deterrence, what I would call contested deterrence, with Iran at the level of state-on-state attacks. By that, I am referring to things like, obviously, attributable ballistic missile attacks from Iran launched against U.S. forces. They have stood their missiles down. They are no longer -- I do not think that is an imminent threat.

What has not been changed is their continuing desire to operate through their proxies indirectly against us, and that is a far more difficult area to deter because they believe they can generate a measure of non-attribution with those attacks. We would not agree because we believe eventually we will be able to distill who is behind these attacks going forward. So we are in a period where state-on-state I believe we have achieved deterrence, but with their proxy activities -- and while they are principally in Iraq, they are not limited to Iraq, and there are other areas where they are active as well. That is the period that we are in now with Iran, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Inhofe: I appreciate that.

As it is right now, we have kind of a deal with the Taliban. We are bringing our troop level down from 12,000 to 8,600, and they, in turn, have commitments to us. I would have two questions. Are they keeping their commitments? Does it appear that they are keeping their commitments to us, and if not, what would be the next step after our withdrawal down to 8.6?

General McKenzie: So, Chairman, obviously my answer will concentrate on the military equities because that is what I am knowledgeable about. But I would tell you in terms of what we see the Taliban doing militarily, they are honoring some, not all of their commitments.

Let me give you an example. Attacks continue. Attacks continue at an unacceptably high rate across the country. Those attacks, although at a high rate, are not delivered into city centers, urban areas, or against coalition forces. Instead, the attacks are largely generated against Afghanistan outposts, checkpoints, and isolated combat units. So those attacks continue. And I would say that that level of attack by the Taliban is not consistent with an organization that intends to keep its word going forward. However, in other areas they have not attacked into the urban areas. They have not attacked coalition forces. So we have a pretty good picture of what the Taliban is doing and is not doing. We have very good ways --

Chairman Inhofe: Well, we have a picture right now, but anticipating -- let us say they do not keep them and they start going the other direction. What would be our action at that time?

General McKenzie: Sir, so we are on a glide slope to go to 8,600 U.S. forces with our NATO partners in the country by the middle of the summer. At that level, we will still be able to pursue all of our objectives in Afghanistan.

Chairman Inhofe: So if they do not and it becomes obvious they are not keeping their commitments, we would maintain the 8.6 as opposed to going any lower.

General McKenzie: Chairman, that would be not a military decision but a policy decision.

Chairman Inhofe: Well, yes.
General McKenzie: But we believe that we are going to have ample opportunity to see if they are going to keep their word. In some areas they are; in some areas they are not. I am troubled by these attacks that continue to occur. And there are obviously some political things that have to go forward that I am not the best person to talk about in terms of the Afghan Government, prisoner releases, and things like that. All of those things have to occur in order to find a path forward.

Chairman Inhofe: Let us go into Barzani. We had the opportunity -- Senator Rounds and I had the opportunity to go through not just Iraq but Erbil and go up and spend time with him. Of course, there are kind of two groups they deal with -- the Kurds are dealing with there. And one of them -- a lot of people were upset and maybe I think misunderstood what the President was doing when he was talking about the Turks coming down into that area.

But as far as the senior -- that would be Masoud Barzani -- he is one that a lot of people are saying or trying to project that he has passed a lot of things to his son and to, I guess, his nephew. It has been my opinion that he is still in charge. And I am not going to ask you whether you agree or disagree with that. But I got a very clear message when we spent most of a day with him up in Erbil, and he is very satisfied that we are keeping our commitments now.

And I really believe he is -- I think we need to keep reminding people how many Kurds have lost their lives working with us.

So would you agree that he is now in pretty good shape with the United States in terms of our keeping our commitments to him?

General McKenzie: Sir, I could not agree with you more. I believe that is the case. As you know, we have a vision of a unified, single Iraq going forward and support that, and we believe he is a key element in that equation going forward.

Chairman Inhofe: We are talking about the senior Barzani.

General McKenzie: Sir, we are.

Chairman Inhofe: I agree with you. Thank you.

Senator Reed?

Senator Reed: Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Just to clarify a point that the chairman has raised, the number that publicly has been released about the increase in forces in CENTCOM since approximately last May is about 14,000. Is that accurate?

General McKenzie: Sir, it is a little less than that, and it varies as carriers come in. You know, when a carrier comes in, you are bringing 5,000 people in. Today I have actually two aircraft carriers in the theater. So the number is artificially a little higher. The number goes up and down.

Senator Reed: But within a range of, say, 1,000 personnel?

General McKenzie: I would say it is over 10,000.

Senator Reed: I know you are working on attribution of the attack last evening at Camp Taji. Have you finished that attribution?

General McKenzie: We are working it very hard right now in my headquarters as we speak now.

Senator Reed: Thank you.

With respect to the agreement between the Taliban and the United States, looking at the public documents that are available, there is no reference to a prohibition of violence by the Taliban against the Afghan Government. And there is at least an interpretation that what they are doing now, attacks against Afghan personnel in or outside cities, is within the scope of the agreement, that we would continue to go forward. Is that accurate?

General McKenzie: So when I have an opportunity to give advice on this subject -- and I do have an opportunity to advise on this -- I would not consider what the Taliban is doing as consistent with any path to going forward to come to a final end state agreement with the current Government of Afghanistan. Those attacks are going to have to come off considerably.

But we are never going to be a bloodless state in Afghanistan. As you know, there are pockets in Afghanistan that probably still think the Russians are there. So it is never going to be perfect, but we need to get way below where we are now.

Senator Reed: There is, though, a possibility that they could, at least until we withdraw, maintain their CT commitments but continue active operations against the Afghan Government. In fact, it could escalate to what would be either a major or a significant civil war in the country. Would we still be in the position or still be predisposed to depart?

General McKenzie: Sir, just speaking looking at the military equity, it is difficult to see how if the Taliban is still pursuing large-scale operations against the Afghan Government, against Afghan Government forces, it would be possible for us to maintain a CT platform there without a significant presence. It is just hard to see how you would get to that level.

Going smaller requires integration, requires intra-Afghan dialogue and some way forward involving both parties.

Senator Reed: And implicit in what has been discussed by the administration about the arrangement is that the final departure will be conditions-based. But those conditions have not yet been specified. Would you decide the conditions, or how will those conditions be established?

General McKenzie: So what would happen is General Miller through me -- we would report the military conditions on the ground, and that would be an input into the larger element of that. But for military conditions, I think again we have got a very clear vision of what is happening there. Taliban attacks against the government would have to go down to a far lower level than they are now. That would be probably the principal thing. Intra-Afghan dialogue should ideally lead to some condition where the Taliban can never be part of some future Afghan military. That would be a matter for the Afghans, not for us. But it is hard to see how you can go forward without some intra-Afghan dialogue that takes you to that.

Senator Reed: Well, just one point is it takes two sides to have a dialogue, and the current Government of Afghanistan is in some disarray. You have two individuals claiming that they are president. You have dual inaugurations. It is slightly outside your lane, but that is a complicating factor I think.

General McKenzie: Sir, it is.

Senator Reed: And with respect to our involvement, even with an intra-Afghan dialogue and even on a sort of an optimistic thing, you would assume that if there is that dialogue, there will be some jointness in the government.
Taliban elements coming into the government.

It comes down to sustainability over the long run, and as you well know, their defense budget is about $6 billion a year. We and our coalition partners provide $4.5 billion a year. If we were to pull that money or decrease it significantly, their ability just to function as a military and police force in the nation would probably be gutted. Is that fair?

General McKenzie: Sir, I would agree with that assessment.

Senator Reed: And so we are going to be faced -- this is the best scenario -- with a government that might be Taliban, et cetera not fully consistent with all of our values and views, and we would still be asked and need to provide billions of dollars. Is that fair?

General McKenzie: Sir, it would. But my advice -- and obviously, many of those things are outside of my competence. My advice would be are we able to do the thing we are there to do, which is to prevent the generation of attacks against the United States and our homeland and those of our allies from ISIS and al Qaeda, typically in eastern Afghanistan. Is what you have described going to yield that result? And that would be the basis for any advice that I would give.

Senator Reed: Thank you very much, General. Thank you for your service.

Chairman Inhofe: Senator Cotton?

Senator Cotton: General, thanks for coming back. This is the first appearance since your troops killed Qassem Soleimani. I want to commend you for your role and their role in removing the world’s worst terrorist mastermind from the face of the earth.

Is it fair to say that Iran’s leaders were somewhat chastened by the killing of Qassem Soleimani?

General McKenzie: I think it is. Just a little earlier, we talked about capability and will. They have never doubted our capability. They often doubted our will, and I think that gave them something to think about.

Senator Cotton: Back in the day in the 2000s, Qassem Soleimani traveled with extreme operational security. Is that correct?

General McKenzie: That is correct.

Senator Cotton: During much of the 20 teens, did he shed that operational security and travel more openly to the point of posting pictures of himself on social media?

General McKenzie: Well, I think he communicated a lot to a lot of different people. I would just leave it at that.
Senator Cotton: Suggesting that he felt a degree of impunity to travel around and wreck havoc against the United States, impunity that he did not have after all.

Let us stay on Iran, and let us talk about coronavirus in particular. We obviously know that it has impacted some of the senior leaders in their regime. We have seen it on television news. Do you have an assessment of just how extensive it is among Iran’s leadership?

General McKenzie: Certainly. You know, we have seen public admissions of various senior leaders that are ill and a couple that have actually died. I think it is having an affect on how they make decisions, and I think it slows them down.

There are a couple pressures on Iranian leadership right now. One is the outrage after the shoot-down of the aircraft after their attack on Al-Asad. That coupled with their inability to effectively respond to the coronavirus is, I think, inducing pressure on and inside the leadership. Of course, we watch that very closely. It is a very opaque state, very hard for us to see in there. But I believe the numbers are probably significantly under-reported in terms of coronavirus victims in Iran. So we look at that pretty hard going forward. Because the permeability and porousness of the borders, Iran sits in the middle of a theater. So their ability to pass that infection to other states is very Senator Cotton: I suspect it actually may be the worst outbreak anywhere in the world, contrary to what Iranian media would say. Does that presumably apply to Iran’s troops as well, both their regular military and IRGC troops, if their society is facing this wide-scale outbreak? Do you assess that their troops are as well?

General McKenzie: I would say it is going to have some affect on the military instrument. We look at it as hard -- we can talk a little bit more about this in closed session, sir, and I would like to do that. But we watch that very closely.

Senator Cotton: What do you assess to be the impact of the oil price collapse over the last 4 days on Iran’s Government and its military capabilities?

General McKenzie: Sir, I think it probably hurts them. They are under grave pressure right now through a variety of economic instruments, you know, the sanctions that are applied against them. I do not think this particularly helps in any way. I think they have an active policy of trying to find ways to swap tankers around the do that, which is marginally successful. So I do not think it means anything good for them. Aside from that, I would just like a little more time to take a look at it. But I do not think it is a good thing for Iran.
Senator Cotton: There has been some talk around the world about providing more humanitarian aid to Iran. Secretary Pompeo recently called for Iran to release all foreign national prisoners before our nation provides them humanitarian aid. Do you think that is a reasonable step?

General McKenzie: I defer to the Secretary of State on that one.

Senator Cotton: What about coronavirus among our troops? What steps are we taking there?

General McKenzie: In the theater right now, we have one contractor with symptoms. We have another person who actually picked it up at the airport after he returned from a trip outside the theater who is in quarantine as well. So we watch that very, very closely.

Right now, we believe we have good precautions in place. We have cut back significantly on intra-theater travel. For example, someone in -- pick a place -- Kuwait who wanted to go to UAE maybe for a weekend of elective liberty -- we do not do that anymore. So that travel is mission-essential only. Just yesterday, we put some restrictions in going into Bahrain as well from outside the theater.

So what we are trying to do is maintain isolation so that we protect the critical functions that we have to do. There are some things where we just cannot accept the risk of an infection. So we look very hard at those things and try to maintain good physical separation.

Senator Cotton: One final question. You say on page 9 of your written testimony that unmanned aircraft systems are, quote, the most concerning tactical development in the CENTCOM area of operations since the rise of the improvised explosive device. Anyone who knows what those improvised explosive devices did to our troops in Iraq and Afghanistan would find that a very troubling statement.

We have spent billions of dollars in the Department of Defense on counter-drone systems. I am concerned that we are still under grave threat to them. But I am also encouraged to see that your command has been experimenting with so many new and more effective counter-drone systems. I am worried that they are not widely fielded yet. So I am just wondering if you could talk to us a little bit about whether your needs are being met and what this committee could do to be more effective on counter-drone systems.

General McKenzie: Sir, the Department is working very hard. As you know, executive sponsorship for this program has gone to the Army, which I think is good. It will focus it and be even more responsive to our requirements.

I think the key thing is right now, we are simply at a stage in the development of these systems, and you see it in the back and forth of warfare where the advantage is with the operator and with the offense. We will catch up. It is going to take us a little time to do that. And really, it is what we would call the group 1 and group 2’s that concern me the most, the small ones that you can go and buy at Costco, you know, duck tape a grenade or mortar bomb to and fly it into an objective. The larger ones -- we have ways to deal with them because they are more like aircraft in a traditional way, although they are still very concerning.

So we have not yet integrated a solution to this. The Army has a lot of great ideas, and there are a variety of other good things out there that are working. We just have not yet managed to bring it all together. We work this every day. And I believe the energy is there, but we are still solving the dynamic.

Senator Cotton: Thank you.

Chairman Inhofe: Senator Blumenthal?

Senator Blumenthal: Thanks, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you for being here, General, and thank you for your service over many, many years.

You have not been here, as has been remarked, since the hearing on December 4th, 2018. So we are very glad to have you back. A lot has happened.

And unfortunately, a lot of the information that this committee receives is behind closed doors in a classified setting. Reference was just made to it by the chairman to follow this meeting. I am very concerned that the American people, as well as service members and military families, are lacking the kind of transparency and accountability that they really deserve and that is necessary for the American people to assess how we are doing in CENTCOM and other places around the world. And I do not know whether you have any comments on that. But the over-classification, the excessive secrecy denies the American people the opportunity to know about the brave and dedicated service of the troops in your command and what they have accomplished, as well as the challenges going forward.

I might just also say that your testimony today at 15 pages is considerably shorter than the more than 40 pages of written testimony that your predecessor, General Votel, provided. I am not judging the quality by the quantity of pages, but I wonder whether you have any plans to submit additional comments or background that would elaborate on some of the conclusions, particularly as to the issue that Senator Cotton just raised which I think is very important, unmanned aerial aircraft, and the threat they pose, analogous to the IEDs which were easy to make, proliferated in the region, caused more than 50 percent of the deaths and a major part of our casualties. And I can see the same happening with these off-the-shelf kind of items that similarly pose a threat of many repeated small-scale attacks on our troops or Afghanistan’s.

Let me just ask you on the issue of transparency, I am at a loss to know why the annexes to our agreement have not been made public. Obviously, they are known to the Taliban. Is there any reason why we cannot make them public so the American people can see them?

General McKenzie: Sir, I am going to defer that to the Department of State. They are actually the classifying authority in this case. So I would defer to them.

Senator Blumenthal: In your military opinion, just from a military standpoint -- I realize there may be other factors -- do you see any obstacle to making them public?

General McKenzie: So obviously as I work the military side of the problem, I have visibility with the annexes. They are useful for me to have. But I would defer the question to wider publication to the Secretary of State.

Senator Blumenthal: I know you are deferring the ultimate decision, and I apologize for belaboring this point. But strictly from the readiness, the preparedness, the effectiveness, and the ability to accomplish missions in the field, I am at a loss to see any reason why they cannot be made public.

General McKenzie: So from a purely military perspective, that is correct. But there are other issues beyond the military that need to be considered, and I would not be competent to pass judgment on that.

Senator Blumenthal: Thank you.

Let me ask you in terms of COVID-19 and its impact on Iran, is it likely that the crippling effect of this disease on certainly the political structure, the economy, and possibly the military are delaying any reprisals for the killing of Soleimani?

General McKenzie: Sir, we spent a lot of time talking about that very point, and the short answer is I just do not know. I would tell you that totalitarian, authoritarian regimes, when they are under extreme pressure, typically react by looking to an external threat. There is very little evidence in the history of warfare of a regime that has a crippling internal problem that decides to focus on solving the crippling internal problem that is the source of all their problems rather than looking for something to unify the masses of its people against an external target. So I am informed by that view, and that I think is a possibility.

They are fractured now, and they are having difficulty dealing with a number of things. So I think it probably makes them, in terms of decision-making, more dangerous rather than less dangerous. But that is just my assessment. There are competing views from smarter people than me on Iran.
Senator Blumenthal: Well, I thank you for that very well informed assessment and appreciate your being here.
Thank you, General.

Thanks, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Inhofe: Senator Hawley?

Senator Hawley: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

General, thank you for being. Thank you for your service.

I want to take this opportunity at the outset to extend again my sincerest condolences to the families of those four American heroes and I think a British ally who have given their lives in Iraq since last Sunday. And thank you for all that you are doing.

Can I come back to this question of deterrence that the chairman and Senator Reed both raised with you? You mentioned that we are having some issue with establishing deterrence against asymmetric aggression. So can I just ask you about the strategy for deterring Iranian asymmetric aggression? What is your thinking on that to date and where are we with it strategically?

General McKenzie: So ultimately you want to convince the ultimate source of the aggression that the object they pursue is too costly to pursue. So when you think about that, you think about going to the source. So you really look to Iran. Iran needs to understand that we hold them ultimately responsible for SMG attacks in Iraq. There is a relationship. The Shia militia groups in Iraq and other proxies across the region -- and there are other places across the region where they are active -- they are not entities unto themselves. They all have some form of causal relationship with Iran. And so I think the best way to convince Iran to cease giving orders to those activities is to convey to them it is not going to get them what they want and may, in fact, have significant consequences for them.

There is one element that the command and control between Iran and their Shia militias groups in Iraq in particular but others as well -- it is not perfect. It is not 1.0. It is not like our chain of command where I am pretty confident if I give an order, it is going to be followed. That is not the way it works, as you know, with those groups. There is a gap there between intent and execution. So it is not perfect control. But I think the key thing is if you want to stop attacks in the gray zone, you need to convince the ultimate person behind those attacks that it is not in their long-term interest to continue them.

Senator Hawley: Let me come back to this question about the pretty sizable conventional force buildup that we have had in CENTCOM since last May. If that has so far not succeeded in deterring these asymmetrical attacks, what in your judgment is it going to take? Do we need additional, in your judgment, conventional forces? I mean, how do we go about practically reaching this asymmetrical deterrence question?

General McKenzie: So you may ultimately live with a low level of proxy attacks in the region. You may not be able to completely do away with that. I would tell you certainly I would believe a redline for the United States is going to be the death of U.S. service members or those of our partners and allies. So that is a redline.

As you know, there have been a variety of attacks over the last month where we had no casualties, small, low level attacks. Of course, the attack yesterday is a tragedy.

But, again, I believe that the way to actually deter those in the long term is to convince the source of those attacks that they are not going to reach their object through those attacks. Let me give you an example.

In Iraq, I think an Iranian goal is to eject the United States from Iraq as part of a larger view that they want us to leave the theater. Iraq is a good place to start because there are certain political constructs in place there that would aid them. So they were fairly quiet for a while as they pursued the political track.

Now, I only can talk about the military side of it, but I believe ultimately we are going to be able to reach a situation with the Government of Iraq where we remain and will not leave. That is my judgment. I could be wrong.
And again, it is ultimately not a military decision. So I think when Iran realizes that -- and I think maybe they have -- then their attacks will begin to -- they have sort of laid their attacks low. Now they will begin to pick up a little bit.

Senator Hawley: If we are going to have to live with some continuing asymmetrical threat -- that is just part of what it means to be in the theater. Let us talk about the 14,000 troops or so. You said maybe it was closer to 10,000 who have been sent to theater since May. In your judgment, how long should we expect that troop buildup to need to last in theater? Is this something you think is going to need to continue on a relatively permanent basis? Give me your assessment about that.

General McKenzie: Senator, I think so long as we continue a maximum pressure campaign against Iran that places diplomatic and economic pressure against them, it is in our best interest to convince Iran that activities they carry out in the military domain -- because that is really the only way they have to operate. They have no really effective way to operate against us diplomatically or economically. Therefore, there response almost by definition has to be in the military domain. What these forces do and what CENTCOM’s objective is is to convince Iran it is not in their best interest to act out either directly or indirectly through proxies or by state actions against us to try to reset the balance of the maximum pressure campaign.

So that gets to your question of how long. My answer would be so long as the maximum pressure campaign continues.

Senator Hawley: Talk to us about the tradeoffs involved here from a National Defense Strategy perspective where we think, again as the chairman mentioned, about the shift to INDOPACOM as the pacing theater. We have this threat in CENTCOM. I mean, what is this going to mean? If we have to sustain the conventional troop buildup in CENTCOM, what will this mean for other NDS priorities?

General McKenzie: Sir, actually the conventional troop buildup in CENTCOM, to include the ships and airplanes, is a fairly small fraction of the total United States military. In my last job, I was the Director of the Joint Staff, and before that, I was the Director of Strategic Plans and Policy. So I am intimately familiar with the NDS, and I am a believer in the NDS. I recognize that in the long term, we need to be postured against China and we need to be postured against Russia. However, being a global power requires you to be able to do several things at once, and these are not binary choices.
So again, we have chosen to execute a maximum pressure campaign against Iran that was not in the NDS. That came along after the NDS was written. The NDS actually I believe is analytically broad enough to accommodate what we are doing against Iran while maintaining pressure against the real existential threats that we face.

Senator Hawley: Thank you, General.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Inhofe: Senator Kaine?

Senator Kaine: Thank you, Mr. Chair.

Thanks, General McKenzie.

Just to follow up on a point with Senator Hawley, did I understand your point to be that Iran really does not believe it has a response to the maximum pressure campaign other than a military response? They do not really have diplomatic pressure levers, and they do not have an economic pressure level of any kind.

General McKenzie: Senator, from where I sit, that is my judgment.

Senator Kaine: So the Iranian activities that are military in nature are directly connected to the maximum pressure campaign. I would agree with you on that.

One of the activities that interested me was the joint naval drill by Iran, Russia, and China in the Gulf of Oman recently. Had Iran, Russia, and China done joint exercises... of that kind together in the past, as far as you know?

  General McKenzie: They have done bilateral exercises. I think it is the first time they have done an exercise of that nature, although, Senator, it would tell you it is not an exercise in the way that we would do an exercise with NATO or we would do an exercise in the theater.

  Senator Kaine: Not as full scale.

  General McKenzie: Yes, sir. That would be an understatement actually.

  Senator Kaine: But in CENTCOM and more generally, we should be very, very attentive to instances where our adversaries are doing anything in combination.

  General McKenzie: Senator, you are absolutely right.

  Senator Kaine: Many of us on the committee are about the ability to handle the mining of the Straits of Hormuz. A couple years ago in the NDAA, we had an amendment that required the Navy to halt decommissioning of older Avenger class minesweepers because we were worried about this. What is your view of our current capacity to handle the mining of the straits or to stop scuttling of ships that would block freedom of navigation through the straits?

  General McKenzie: Senator, today we have four minesweepers in the AOR. The British, our coalition partners, have four minesweepers in the AOR, and I have four minesweeping helicopters. And there are a variety of other things that we can employ as well.

   Should the straits be mined, it would take us a while to clear that channel. It would depend on were we clearing them under conditions of drifting mines that were placed out there, which is the least attributable and probably the most likely way Iran might choose to act in that waterway, or would it be as a condition of a larger war, in which case we would not begin to do that clearing until we could guarantee the safety of these vessels, which are not really capable of defending themselves? So we have the capability to clear the strait. The time it would take would be dependent on the Iranian action that was the precursor for it.

   Senator Kaine: I see.

   One more question about Iran. I have not seen the answer to this. Is there an assessment that the coronavirus spike in Iran is driven by like a lot of back and forth travel between Iran and China, or what is the assessment about why Iran has become an epicenter, say, along with Italy outside of China?

   General McKenzie: There is a lot of travel between Iran and China. But I would not go beyond that. I am just not enough of an expert to tell you.

   Senator Kaine: Got it. Okay.

   A question on Afghanistan. What is your current assessment of kind of in the mil-to-mil space the helpfulness of Pakistan and us doing the work we need to do in Afghanistan?

General McKenzie: Sure. So I maintain a close relationship with General Bajwa, the Chief of Army Staff. We talk frequently. I have been to visit him a couple of times in Pakistan. Their support has been very important in directing the Taliban to come to negotiations, and their continued support is going to be very important as we go through this difficult period of deciding is the Taliban actually serious about this and are they going to live up to their commitments.

Senator Kaine: Do you see that level of U.S. and Pakistan cooperation on the mil-to-mil side with the Afghanistan mission sort of getting better? It has always been good? I mean, how would you assess it kind of historically?

General McKenzie: So we have always had at U.S. Central Command -- and I have about 10 years of experience in this organization. We have always seen a relationship with Pakistan as critical. Whether at the political level, there is turmoil, up and down, we always try to keep the military channel open. There are good reasons to do that, to prevent fratricide, to prevent miscalculation, and things like that. So we work very hard to keep that channel open.

Senator Kaine: Let me ask one last question, and it seems like it is kind of outside of your area of authority. It is about Venezuela, but it deals with a partner in CENTCOM, the UAE. We do a lot of work together with UAE. But the UAE together with India, Turkey, Russia have assisted the Maduro regime in avoiding U.S. sanctions. Have you ever interacted with UAE about their interaction with the Maduro regime in Venezuela?

General McKenzie: Senator, I have not.

Senator Kaine: All right. I appreciate it. Thank you.

Chairman Inhofe: Senator Ernst?

Senator Ernst: Thank you, Mr. Chair.

And, General McKenzie, thank you so much for your service to our nation. And I echo the thoughts and prayers from the rest of my colleagues on the losses that we have had in the recent week. So please extend that to those families, if you would, sir.

I do take very seriously Congress’ role in authorizing the use of military force. And we have to ensure that our troops have the correct authorities to do the missions that we ask them to do. Now, there has been a lot of debate, not just within this committee, but with a number of our colleagues outside of this committee about repealing an AUMF and maybe putting a new one in place.

Can you tell us what the operational impact would be of repealing either the 2001 or 2002 AUMF? And in your view, do you believe a new authorization for the use of military force is necessary to adequately cover down and conduct operations in your AO?

General McKenzie: Ma’am, many of those questions are above my level of competence. But I would tell you I believe I have the authorities I need now to execute operations in CENTCOM.

Senator Ernst: So utilizing the current AUMF --

General McKenzie: Yes, ma’am.

Senator Ernst: -- you are able to operate.

General McKenzie: That is correct.

Senator Ernst: Well, I appreciate that. Again, the debate that we have has been pretty extensive on what we could do with or without that AUMF. So thank you for that feedback. That is a debate for us, but we do need that input to know whether you are able to adequately operate.

Moving on to a different topic with our special operators, the “Washington Post” had an article on the 5th of March that stated, quote, a new network of special operations forces will serve as the backbone of a smaller U.S. military mission in Afghanistan. End quote. Of course, the purpose of our special operations network is to continue rooting out ISIS in that area and apply pressure to the Taliban if they fail to live up to their end of the peace agreement.

So what can you tell us about this new special operations network?

General McKenzie: Ma’am, I begin by saying I do not think it is actually new. I think it is the way we have done business for quite a while in Afghanistan. We have embedded CT forces that operate against that specific mission, have done it for many years, and it would be the way that we would go forward.

It is important to understand that for special operations forces to be most effective, they need to operate within a conventional force structure. And that provides the ecosystem that they use to move around. If they get in trouble, there is someone that can come to help them. So we always tend to think in that way, not only there but in other places across the theater as well. Special operations forces are vitally important to us, but they exist best when they are flourished within a network of, A, U.S. conventional forces and then a host nation force as well.

Senator Ernst: Which, yes, was going to be my next question about the conventional forces. So I was just trying to understand within this article what was new about what they were being required to do.

General McKenzie: Ma’am, I often take up with “Washington Post” articles to understand exactly what it is they are saying. In this case, I do not see anything particularly new.

Senator Ernst: Okay, outstanding.

And of course, then our special operators -- will they need to maintain different strategic locations than where they are now, or will they largely remain in place?

General McKenzie: So it will depend on if we go to the force level that I have been told to go to, 8,600. We have a good lay-down for that. Going below that level would require guidance to me and it would depend on the permissiveness of the environment. If you go lower and go to fewer bases, typically you are going to do it because the security situation is permissive. You do not have to defend yourself against Taliban attacks even as you are executing operations against ISIS and al Qaeda. So it would be strictly dependent on the overall permissiveness of the situation, and those days are still ahead of us. And we have a variety of ways for looking at that, and we will look at that very closely as we go ahead.

Senator Ernst: Wonderful. A number of us did travel to Afghanistan prior to Thanksgiving, and we were able to visit some of the commando training with the Afghan forces. Do you feel that they are now getting to a point where they will be able to nest with great capability with our special operators on the ground?
General McKenzie: We have made great strides with the commando forces in Afghanistan. Your sense is exactly right.

Senator Ernst: Thank you very much, sir. I appreciate it.

Thank you, Mr. Chair.

Chairman Inhofe: Senator King?

Senator King: Thank you, Mr. Chair.

I have realized that the questions I am about to embark upon are more policy and that your job is executing policy, but I just want to get some of your thoughts.

In your testimony on page 4, you said, since May 2019, Iran supported groups in Iraq, have attacked U.S. interests dozens of times, conducted scores of unmanned aerial system reconnaissance flights. They have attacked and seized foreign vessel in the Gulf. You go on to list all the things Iran is doing. And I think you testified in response to Senator Hawley’s question that they are not being deterred in the asymmetric area, in the proxy area. It has always been a proxy war. I mean, that is what it has always been.

Here is my problem. In 2017, we left the JCPOA, which they were abiding by. All intelligence unequivocally said that Iran was in compliance with all the provisions of the JCPOA. We put on the maximum pressure campaign, but as you have testified, it does not seem to be working because they are still doing what they were doing before.

The major difference today is -- and I do not want to get into classified material, but Iran is significantly closer to break-out to a bomb than they were when we left the agreement in -- I think it was 2018. I do not get it. It is exactly what many of us were worried before the JCPOA. You have got a malign Iran acting irresponsibly throughout the region getting close to a nuclear weapon. Help me out here. I do not really understand it. They are still doing it, and we probably will find out that the attack last night was a Shia militia supported by Iran. I mean, I think that is probably where the evidence is going to head. I do not have any intelligence on that, but I am speculating. Give me some thoughts.

General McKenzie: Senator, so the maximum pressure campaign, in terms of its effect on the Iranian economy, there are other people --

Senator King: Well, there is no question it has had an effect on the Iranian economy, but it has not had any effect on the activity we were hoping to deter. You have testified to that.

General McKenzie: So I would argue actually, as a result of the buildup in Iranian activity over the course of the summer, the establishment of the International Maritime Security construct actually shifts -- the Straits of Hormuz are no longer harassed. They are passing without any problem at all back and forth not because we are taking actions aimed directly at Iran, but rather because we and an international coalition are shining a spotlight when that activity occurs. So the activity is not occurring.

Senator King: Interesting you mentioned the international coalition. I completely agree with you, which we blew up when we left the JCPOA. The international coalition that put that agreement in place did not agree with our decision. We took it unilaterally, but that is another discussion.

But, again, do you believe that they are being deterred from their proxy attacks throughout the region?

General McKenzie: I believe that we are deterring them from state-on-state attacks.

Senator King: But that is not the issue. It has not been a state-on-state situation. The attacks have always been through proxies.

General McKenzie: Sir, actually on January the 7th, we had a clear state-on-state attack.

Senator King: After we killed Soleimani. Correct?

That was the missile attack.

General McKenzie: That is the missile attack.

Senator King: Yes, okay. But we killed Soleimani and then they responded. But historically the attacks have always been through proxies. And my point is they are still doing it. The only difference is they are also headed toward a nuclear weapon. And I do not get how that is in the best interest of the United States or the region.

Senator King: Sir, I understand your argument. Many of those issues are not CENTCOM issues.

I would tell you that I come back to what I think my military task is. As the maximum pressure campaign continues, my military task is to prevent Iran from taking actions directly or indirectly that would challenge the activities that are ongoing.

Senator King: I appreciate that. And you are doing an excellent job. And it is a tragedy what happened yesterday and the last week to our troops. I think everyone here recognizes that.

Just in a few seconds left, is there a plan B if the Taliban does not abide by this agreement in Afghanistan? In other words, do they believe that we are going to leave come hell or high water, or do they still have some worry that we are going to stay there if they do not act right? Because as you testified, they are doing plenty of attacks right now. I worry that after 17, 18, 19 years, we are going to end up exactly where we were in 2001 with the Taliban in charge of the country and open season for terrorists.
General McKenzie: Senator, I had the opportunity to give advice on the plan that we are executing now, and my advice was to proceed with it. And the principal reason that I supported it was the conditionality that is inherent in it. So we are going to have an opportunity to see what the Taliban do.

Senator King: Do we know what the conditions are?

General McKenzie: Sir, on the military side, I know very clearly what the conditions --

Senator King: Do we? Does the American public know?

General McKenzie: Sir, I am not sure that I would be the one to answer that.

Senator King: Well, thank you for your testimony. I appreciate it. And again, I understand your job is to execute policy, but you are the nearest thing we have to a policymaker on this issue here this morning. And I appreciate your candid answers to my questions.

General McKenzie: Thank you, sir.

Senator King: Thank you.

Chairman Inhofe: Senator Cramer?

Senator Cramer: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, General, for your service and for being here. And I too express my condolences to you and to the families for the loss of your/our two soldiers and, of course, our friend from the United Kingdom.
General, this year, of course, the Air Force is asking us in their budget proposal to divest in critical ISR assets and a way to allow for more room to invest in new technologies and future ISR assets. And I am very aware of the critical role that these ISR assets, some of these legacy assets have played in CENTCOM, including some from my home State of North Dakota. And I would like your take on, first of all, what the Department of Defense and/or the Air Force have told you to expect with regard to meeting your ISR obligations or requirements if this fiscal year 2021 budget is enacted.

General McKenzie: Thank you, sir. I actually possess most of the ISR assets the Department has, and I am cognizant of that. At the same time, as we were talking just a few minutes ago, as for the former Director of the Joint Staff and the J-5, I am very much aware of the need to prepare and turn to face the threat from China and the threat from Russia. Those are existential threats and we need to capitalize. We need to invest. We need to move in that direction.

For me, it actually comes down to a platform, and that platform is the MQ-9. That is the platform of choice in the CENTCOM AOR. It is a platform that can gather intelligence. It can strike. It can do all kinds of things. It is a jack of all trades. And I would prefer that the Air Force not divest of that resource right now to the degree that they are doing. I acknowledge that the Air Force has some tough decisions to make as they take a look at the future of the China threat. And the MQ-9 is not necessarily a platform that is useful in a dense air defense environment. I recognize that. But for right now and for the threats that to me are much closer actually than the longer-term threats of China that are deeper and graver, I favor retaining those assets as long as possible.

Senator Cramer: I appreciate your answer, and I agree. The MQ-9 is really quite a remarkable asset. We are just trying to assess the risk and whether the risk is worth it and how we transition because I also agree that we need to get to another place.

With that in mind, I want to transition then in the discussion to the Space Force. And of course, we understand that many of the new technologies we are talking about would be space assets. And I am just wondering, first of all, are you expecting to get some benefit in CENTCOM from space, ISR assets? I would expect the answer would be yes. But then the question becomes the gap between here and there and the risk in the middle of it. Are we preparing to adequately mitigate that risk?

General McKenzie: Senator, I use space assets every day, every hour in U.S. Central Command. And they provide unique capabilities. The total ISR picture is best built when it is complemented by air-breathing platforms as well. But for all of my life and particularly in U.S. Central Command, we cannot survive without space assets.

Senator Cramer: I think you have answered my questions, including a couple that I have not asked yet. So I appreciate that and appreciate the time and am happy to yield back some time.

Chairman Inhofe: Senator Hirono?

Senator Hirono: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

General, as long as we are on the subject of ISR, are your general ISR requirements being met?

General McKenzie: Yes, they are.

Senator Hirono: Are you able to leverage the ISR capacity of partners and allies in the region?

General McKenzie: I am able to leverage both partners in the region and partners and allies out of the region that deploy into the region.

Senator Hirono: So regarding the peace agreement with the Taliban, you had testified on March 10th, not too long ago, before the House Armed Services Committee that the U.S. had not developed military plans for the full withdrawal. And based on what you testified today and also how you testified before that you did not have much confidence that the Taliban would honor its commitments, so at this rate are we ever going to meet the timeline of complete withdrawal by the end of the year?

General McKenzie: Senator, that will be a condition --

Senator Hirono: By the end of the year or pretty much in any foreseeable future.

General McKenzie: So I am confident we are going to go to 8,600 by the middle of the summer. I think a decision to go below that level is a political not a military decision. I will have an opportunity to give a recommendation on that and then will be directed what to do.

Senator Hirono: There are not very many indications that the Taliban is going to stop pursuing its attacks. So as you say, they would have to decrease those attacks against Afghan forces substantially before we would go much below the 8,600 troops. So it seems to me that we are going to be in Afghanistan a long, long time. We certainly cannot predict when we are going to be out of there, and this war has already cost us $2 trillion, killed more than 3,500 Americans and coalition troops. So this is a really troubling area of the world. The entire Middle East is.

So you would agree the stability, such as it can be, in the Middle East is a good thing for the United States.

General McKenzie: Senator, I would agree.

Senator Hirono: Yes. And so meanwhile, Senator King had pointed out that Iran is pursuing its nuclear ambitions and that they could very well have a nuclear weapon. Would Iran having a nuclear weapon not add to the instability of the region? Would it not encourage other countries in the region to also develop nuclear weapons that would end up being an even more unstable region than we currently have?

General McKenzie: Senator, my understanding of the object of our policy is to prevent Iran from developing a nuclear weapon.

Senator Hirono: Well, they are going ahead with it from what we can see. And our departure from JCPOA has only hastened that situation. I think all around, the impact of our withdrawal from the JCPOA is certainly being manifested.

I have a question about China and Russia. As they continue to make significant investments in the area of your responsibility, so they are cultivating relationships and providing financial support. And in particular, China has invested an estimated $200 billion -- $200 billion -- in the Middle East in the past 15 years, and both Russia and China continue to develop relationships with leaders in the region such as Syrian President Bashar Assad.

What risk does the United States face as Russia and China increase investments and influence in your area of responsibility, knowing full well that Russia and China are our near-peer competitors?

General McKenzie: Senator, I think the greatest risk, although it is in the future, is from China. And you noted very correctly they are leading with their economics. Although they have established a significant military presence in Djibouti, their military presence throughout the rest of the theater is actually quite small. But I think we are seeing the leading edge of economic in-roads.

I think Russia is a little more complicated. They are not spending as much money. We see more Russian military deployments, but I think it is harder for them to sustain, with the exception of Syria.

Senator Hirono: So what can we do? What are we doing? Because China really employs a whole-of-government approach to what they are doing not only in this area of the world, but clearly in the Indo-Pacific area. So what are we doing? Are we pursuing a whole-of-government approach to counter particularly China’s activities in both regions?

General McKenzie: So, Senator, again, this is not an area of my particular expertise. But I believe we are looking at whole-of-government responses to China in the AOR and in the bridge really between CENTCOM and USAFRICOM, which is where their road actually takes them as well.

Senator Hirono: That may sound reassuring, but you know, I really question whether or not we are pursuing the kind of whole-of-government approach that China is.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.
Chairman Inhofe: Senator Peters?

Senator Peters: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And, General, thank you for being here and your testimony here today. I would also like to join my colleagues in offering my sincere condolences to the loved ones and families of those members who we lost recently.

You have command in a very dangerous region. Over the past several months, our service members and installations have suffered several rocket attacks. I am concerned about the serious miscommunication to the American people and, quite frankly, to the men in uniform and their families about the damage assessment following an attack in January that we had against our facilities. We were initially told that there were no injuries. Then we were told about a dozen soldiers suffered traumatic brain injuries. Then several dozen -- the latest reports show that more than 100 troops have been diagnosed with a brain injury from this attack, many of whom were transferred out of country for treatment.

So my question to you, sir, is how did this miscommunication occur? Was CENTCOM forced to give a rushed assessment, or did the White House make an announcement without having any facts?

General McKenzie: Senator, thank you for the question. I actually would like to talk about that.
I am solely and completely responsible for the first notification that there were no casualties. I am the officer who gave that report based on my assessment of what happened at Al-Asad. There was no pressure on me to give that report. That was we thought in the immediate hours after the attack because it was not evident to us that there had been concussion injuries. Maybe if we were smarter, we would have picked up on that, but there were no kinetic injuries. No one was bleeding. No bones were broken. So it was our assessment and the assessment of my commanders on the ground. But I am the single person who passed that report. So I bear total responsibility for that with no one else.

So, therefore, after that, concussions presented themselves. TBI presented itself. And as you know, Senator, that is not an injury like a broken arm or a broken leg that can be immediately diagnosed on the spot. These injuries come back and forth. Sometimes they manifest themselves over time. Sometimes it takes months to do that.

Two things I can tell you. I was never under any pressure from anyone at any time to shade this reporting. The Secretary of Defense never said anything to me about it. The Chairman never said anything to me about it. The President never said anything to me about it. We were driven solely by medical diagnosis on scene. So that is one
The second point is I am completely confident that every American service man or woman that was at Al-Asad got the very best medical treatment that really our system can provide. And so the numbers changed. So they did as people were presented, as people were evaluated, I took the trouble to actually dig into what is called the MACE-2, which is the clinical tool that is given on site to develop some of the initial indications of are you concussed and what is it. It is a pretty good tool. So I wanted to make sure I understood it fully and the difficulty of administering it.

And you are right. 110 people were diagnosed. We evacuated 35 of them out of the theater to Landstuhl. A further 28 have come back to the United States. Some people have gone back to duty. We continue to take a look at that.

I would never minimize the significance of traumatic brain injury. I mean, just the description of the injury itself is concerning. And we still have a lot to learn about it, but I believe that people that were injured and received injuries of that nature at Al-Asad have gotten very good medical treatment as a result of it.

Senator Peters: Well, thank you for that answer. And you have answered some of my next question. The President said -- I think he said, quote, they had headaches, a couple of other things, but I would say and I can report it is not very serious. End of quote. That is what we heard from the President that they had headaches.

The question to you. There are hundreds of thousands of U.S. military veterans that are suffering from TBI, as you are well aware. Do you agree that those injuries are serious and not merely headaches?

General McKenzie: I believe any injury to the brain is a serious injury.

Senator Peters: Thank you.

General, in your written statement, you assert despite the death of Baghdadi in October, ISIS remains a threat in Syria and most of its activities focused on reestablishing networks, assassinating and intimidating local leaders and security forces and extending its influence in rural areas throughout Syria and Iraq. You state, similar to Afghanistan, most of the U.S. intelligence community predicts that without sustained pressure, ISIS has the potential to reconstitute itself in both Iraq and Syria.

The President seems to have a different view and says that basically -- well, he takes credit for 100 percent defeat of ISIS and used that as justification to withdraw troops from Syria back in October of 2019.

So my question to you as commander, because there is inconsistency in what we are hearing from the President and from you, how do you navigate between the Department of Defense and the IC’s very ominous assessment of the ISIS threat with the President’s more optimistic assessment?

General McKenzie: So I will tell you based on guidance that I have been given, which came from the Secretary of Defense, we have repositioned ourselves in eastern Syria, what we call the Eastern Syria Security Area, where we are carrying on operations against ISIS with our SDF partners. And those operations are actually very effective. And I think as long as we maintain pressure on them, we will be at a place where it is going to be difficult for them to generate and deliver external attack plotting, external attack plotting meaning attacks against the United States or Europe. As long as we have the ability to do that -- and we do have the ability to do that now both with the forces that are there and the positions that we are in -- we are going to be able to keep that pressure on.

Senator Peters: Thank you.

Chairman Inhofe: Senator Blackburn?

Senator Blackburn: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And, General, thank you for being here. And I join with others in expressing our condolences to those last night, the two Americans and the Brit that we lost in the attacks.

Just to be sure that we have got our notes right, it is not 14,000 troops that were added. It was 10,000?
General McKenzie: The number goes up and down based on -- forces flow in and out of the theater all the time. I would say the number is closer to 10,000. But it is difficult to put a single figure on it. When a carrier comes in, 5,000 people come in. That is roughly correct. I would not want to give you a single number.

Senator Blackburn: All right. That is fair. Let us talk a little bit about what you are doing to deter gray zone attacks. I think that we need to hear a little bit from you on that, if you will.

General McKenzie: Sure. So as the maximum pressure campaign against Iran continues, they are unable to really respond economically or diplomatically, the two channels that we are using to place pressure on them. As they seek to find a way to respond, the only way that is left is the military component. And the military component -- they can do it one of two ways. They can do it directly, a state attack, and they have done that with the attack on Al-Asad, or they can do it indirectly, which the proxy attacks, gray zone attacks, as you indicate there.

There is evidence over the course of the summer and the fall that Iran wanted to pursue those gray zone activities in order to force us to reconsider the maximum pressure campaign, in order to make us back off from that. And so where we are right now is we believe as a result of the ballistic missile attack on Al-Asad, in the wake of that, rough state-on-state deterrence has been reestablished and that Iran does not seem to want to engage in another exchange of that nature because that would ultimately be a very bad outcome for them. And I think they recognize that. However, they are still of the opinion that they can pursue their objectives through attacks that they would hope would either be unattributable or be below the level where we will respond. And that poses a very grave danger for them because I am not certain they do have an exact understanding of what our redlines are and where we are not going to be pushed. So we see that in Iraq. We also see it in other places in the theater. But we see it principally in Iraq because Iran is pursuing a dream of American ejection from the theater, and they would like for that to begin in Iraq. So that is where we see it most readily.

Senator Blackburn: Then let me ask you this. When we are talking about Iran, do you think they are more bold or less bold than they were a year ago?

General McKenzie: So they were very bold in the late spring/early summer of 2019, and they were bold because they have never doubted our capability, but they doubt our will. So additionally in the spring and summer of 2019, the theater had been significantly drawn down in terms of capability. So they could observe that CENTCOM did not possess the forces that it had in the past. So a confluence of a judgment about our will and a judgment about our capability led them, to answer your question, to be pretty bold.

I believe they are less bold now probably most significantly impacted by the death of Qassem Soleimani.

Senator Blackburn: So then as we talk about their presence in Iraq and their goal of ejecting us from that theater, then outside of adding personnel, which I think it is fair to say you do not have the personnel to add, then what can we do in Iraq that is going to end up enhancing our force protection? How do we do that so that we keep Iran in a diminishing posture instead of a bolder posture?

General McKenzie: So, first of all, you look to the source. If the source is Iran, to reestablish deterrence, you want to establish the idea in the mind of the opponent that the object they seek will be more painful than its attainment. So it is more painful to get there than it is to actually hold it. And so you do that by being very clear to them about things that we are going to tolerate and things that we are going to not tolerate. So that is one path.

The other path at the same time --

Senator Blackburn: So in other words, they have to see our will, or as my kids would say, put the hurt on them.
General McKenzie: That is a very good way to state it, ma’am.

Senator Blackburn: Yes, okay.

General McKenzie: So meanwhile in Iraq, we are in Iraq at the invitation of the Iraqi Government. The Iraqi Government has responsibilities to provide protection for us. And actually practically the best way to get at this problem is to continue to work with our Iraqi hosts and partners to get after the SMG threat because it threatens them as well.

Senator Blackburn: I yield back.

Chairman Inhofe: General McKenzie, excellent testimony. We appreciate it very much. As we stated at the beginning of this hearing, we are going to go now down to SVC-217 for a closed session. We will see who shows up.

We are adjourned.

[Whereupon, at 10:20 a.m., the hearing was adjourned.]
